The Prosperity of the South.

The Harrisburg (Pa.) Patriot easy:

"The South is about entering a period of great prosperity. Its press speaks entusiastically of business prospects which the absence of political disturbance and "an abundant crop of everything that is needed for home use or trade," present to the Southern people. No such crops have been seen in thirty years as bless that section this year. 'In addition to a cotton crop which is estimated at over, 7,000,000 bales,' says the Savannah News, 'there is an extraordinary corn crop and mere than an average rice crop, and the farmer enters upon the season with less indebtedness than usual.'

Such a promising state of affairs in an important part of our country can not fall to gratify those who take an interest in the welfare of the whole. The South has had a long period of depression. She has suffered political and financial misfortunes. But the worst is over, a new South is about entering upon a new career of prosperity brought about by a new system of labor, new channels of enterprise and new processes of industry applied to the development of her wonderful natural resources.

Seven million bales of cotton represent an immense amount of wealth. A region capable of producing it has the means of great prosperity, and there is something wonderful in the increase of this production over what it was before the war. The largest amount raised in any one year during that era was three and a half millions of bales, and then it was 'thought that cotton wasking. It was also believed that the institution of slavery was indispensable to its successful production. A crop by free labor twice as large as the largest produced in the slave times, shows what an amazing change has taken place. Cotton is not king in the sense in which it was once claimed to be, but its power in a commercial sense is twice as great as it was at any time before slavery went out of existance.

Another evidence of the substantial prosperity of the South the substantial prosperity of the South,
